Re: GN Docket No. 09-191

January 14, 2010

Dear Chairman Genachowski and Commissioners:

As an attorney in the State of Ohio, wide availability to internet access is very important to my business. My current access to the internet helps me expand my business, as well as conduct business more efficiently and effectively.

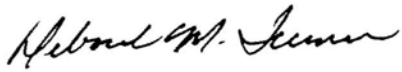

Consumers are enjoying tremendous choices and innovation wireless technologies. In just a few short years wireless technologies and the Internet have completely transformed how society communicates. The transformation is unmistakable.

Further, businesses and employers have begun to rely on the economic opportunities these technologies provide because, not only do we communicate through these technologies, we also utilize them to buy goods and services. And yet, despite this great success story from these industries, the FCC is looking to impose new government regulations that will gum up the works.

The Internet needs to be managed from security threats and users who use the information superhighway as their own "Wide Load" – putting other users in a pinch. Network providers provide this function well and should be permitted to manage these networks further as demand for broadband and the exciting opportunities it brings increase exponentially.

We respectfully urge the FCC to wisely refrain from dictating new government regulations onto these industries that are leading our economy today and are poised to do so well into the future.

Sincerely,
